Chapter 23

Concluding Comments
on the Federal Vision

E. Calvin Beisner

Introduction

With Joey Pipa in chapter 2 above, I wish first to applaud and join advocates of the Federal Vision (whom, henceforward, I shall call “Federal Visionists”) in their criticism of modern evangelicalism’s over-subjectivism—indeed, not only that but also its individualism and its strong tendencies, in some circles, toward antinomianism and, in others, toward morbid introspection in the quest for assurance. I also applaud their renewed emphasis on the importance of the covenant to both systematic and Biblical theology and to the everyday life of individual believers, of congregations, and of the Church universal. When I look at the superficiality, democratism, latitudinarianism, worldliness, and multitude of other ills afflicting the church in North America—including the Reformed church—I find myself feeling much more comfortable in the company of the Monroe Four and their associates than in that of the broad generality of professing Christians and their pastors. When I read Doug Wilson’s lament over how parents and church officers, by refusing to admit children to baptism (in Baptist churches) or the Lord’s Supper (in Presbyterian churches) despite their professions of love for Jesus, effectively teach their children to doubt rather than to believe, I respond, “Amen! Preach it, Brother!”—and I join heartily in his call for repentance. I thrill at Steve Schlissel’s saying, “We have drumming rights as the people of the atonement, the people who have forgiveness, the people who have reconciliation, the people who have access to God, the people who have the law, the people who have wisdom, the people who have fellowship with God and with one another, the people who have a history like no other, the people who have a future like no other.” The church needs to learn that God’s intention is for it to be not the tail but the head (Deuteronomy 28:13). My broad commitments, concerns, and postures are solidly with these brothers.

However, extensive study of their oral and written teachings on the special concerns of the Federal Vision convinces me that they have taught, alongside some wonderful truths, some serious errors about covenant theology and its implications for salvation, personal and corporate spirituality and piety, the use and understanding of the sacraments, and the conduct of theology and Biblical studies in general. Sadly, their mistakes undermine their very laudable goals. Their attempt to assure tender souls who doubt their salvation while they trust in Christ collapses, and the poor souls are left more confused than before, because the objectivity of the covenant is inadequate to the task—while the presumptuous who hear that aspect of their message may be led, inadvertently, to the false assurance of formalism. At the same time, their attempt to destroy the complacency of the presumptuous is in profound danger of promoting a legalistic notion of works righteousness. Extensive discussion of all my concerns is impossible here and would, even if possible, encroach on the chapters that are the body of this book. I hope it will be more helpful for me, in this context, to set forth some of my most crucial critiques and a few thoughts on underlying problems.

Nontraditional Use of Traditional Terms

One thing that became clear through the colloquium papers and discussions is that the Federal Visionists are using some traditional terms in nontraditional ways, and that this has caused some misunderstanding. Although some of the responsibility for the misunderstanding rests with their critics, who often have failed to notice this, some undoubtedly rests with the Federal Visionists for not making their distinct, nontraditional definitions explicit in the contexts in which they use them. Consider just two examples. If in Reformed circles one is going to speak of election and mean by it not God’s choice from eternity past that Robert is going to go to heaven but His choice that Robert is going to be joined to the outward, objective, covenant community—from which he might through apostasy be separated and wind up in hell—one really ought to make that unmistakably clear. Likewise, if one is going to claim that in the very act of baptism one is regenerated and mean by it not that Patricia is going to be translated from spiritual death to spiritual life, given saving faith and repentance, and savingly united to Christ, but (among other possible notions) that Patricia is going to be transferred from outside the objective covenant community to inside it, again, one ought to make that clear.

I cannot speak for others, but I must admit that, having read, carefully and often repeated, hundreds of pages of the Federal Visionists’ discussion of such things, while I find it crystal clear that 3 Let me clarify: The historical covenant, membership in which is clear through birth to covenant parents or baptism, is inadequate to the task, because membership in it is predicated on the faith and obedience of sinners, however faithful and obedient they may be, and therefore it is revocable. The transcendent covenant, which may be seen as having two aspects, first, the covenant of redemption between the Father and the Son, and second the covenant of grace between God, on the one hand, and Christ and all who are His on the other, is thoroughly adequate. The Federal Vision offers the former, not the latter, as the basis for assurance of salvation. For further on this, see the last four paragraphs of chapter 15 above.

sometimes this is happening, often I simply cannot tell whether they are using the terms in their traditional senses and thus actually teaching substantively different doctrines from those propounded in historic Reformed confessional standards and theological writings, or using the terms in nontraditional senses and thus not teaching different doctrines. Sometimes, too, I find it impossible not to think they are using the terms in their traditional senses while teaching contrary to the standards—and, much more importantly, to the Scriptures.

The Federal Visionists repeat often that they are propounding a new paradigm, a new way of seeing (as suggested in the title of Schlissel’s chapter 3 in this book, adapted from talks he gave at the 2002 and 2003 AAPCs). New paradigms often introduce new (or recovered) ways of using terms, and there is nothing wrong with that. But it is essential, if they are to be understood and thus not needlessly criticized, that those who promote the new paradigms clearly and carefully define their terms. This the Federal Visionists often fail to do. This said, it remains true that their critics have an equal responsibility to read them carefully to determine how they are using terms and so not to erect and attack straw men. Although those who participated in the colloquium seem, mostly, to have succeeded pretty well at this, many of their other critics have not.

Assurance and the Objectivity of the Covenant

One of the Federal Visionists’ driving motivations is clearly to give badly needed comfort and assurance to Christians plagued by unnecessary fears about their salvation. That is laudable. It is also laudable to point these troubled souls away from excessive subjectivism that so often expresses itself in morbid introspection. Like them, I have counseled dear souls who, despite their clearly expressing trust in Christ alone for their salvation, and despite their lives’ showing the fruits of salvation, have struggled grievously with doubts about their salvation. Like the Federal Visionists, I believe we must direct such saints to a more objective means of assessing their standing before God.

But they err by going to the opposite extreme. Their answer seems to be, “Don’t get all tangled up trying to see whether you have sincere faith in Christ. Look to your baptism!” Thus Wilkins said, “when we say . . . ‘Look to your baptism,’ we’re talking about looking to Christ in the covenant, and realizing what you can know for certain. You cannot know if you were ever sincere. You cannot know if you really meant it when you asked Jesus into your heart and threw the pine cone into the fire. You can’t know those. Those questions are unanswerable. Were you really given a new heart? Well, you can’t answer that question. God knows. You don’t know. What you can know is that you have been baptized and you have the Lord’s Supper.”

Now, this only helps the troubled Christian if somehow being baptized (or partaking of the Lord’s Supper—but Wilkins focused on baptism, so I shall do likewise) and being saved can be equated. Just that seems to be Wilkins’s point, for he went on to say that this view helps pastorally in that “It makes our standing before God and that of our children plain, and yet it prevents presumption. . . . We belong to Christ. Baptism is the infallible sign and seal of this. . . . And in regard to our assurance, we are pointed away from ourselves and what we think we perceive to be true of us inwardly, which

*I am not convinced, for example, despite many critics’ saying so, that any of the Federal Visionists actually believes that the rite of baptism effects (whether ex opere operato or otherwise) regeneration in the traditional sense of one’s passing from dead in trespasses and sins to alive in Christ. Some of them definitely assert baptismal regeneration in a very different sense, but critics must not confuse the one with the other.
no one can know, and pointed to Christ, the only ground of our assurance.” More conclusively, Wilkins wrote in his paper for the colloquium, “If [someone] has been baptized, he is in covenant with God” (chapter 19 above, line 535); “covenant is union with Christ. Thus, being in covenant gives all the blessings of being united to Christ . . . . Because being in covenant with God means being in Christ, those who are in covenant have all spiritual blessings in the heavenly places” (lines 305-306, 309-310). It follows necessarily from these two statements that if someone has been baptized, he has all spiritual blessings in the heavenly places. But what is it to have “all spiritual blessings in the heavenly places”? The phrase originated in Ephesians 1:3, and in that context Paul includes among such “spiritual blessings” election to holiness and blamelessness before God, predestination for adoption and to be to the praise of God’s glory, redemption through Christ’s blood, forgiveness of trespasses, an inheritance in Christ, and reception of the Holy Spirit as seal and guarantee of inheritance “until we acquire the possession of it” (Ephesians 1:3-14). These blessings are certainly salvific, and they reach all the way from election before creation to final salvation at the end of history. That Wilkins had in mind in his own use of the phrase “all spiritual blessings in the heavenly places” is clear from his list drawn from 1 Corinthians—a list that includes sanctification, calling, the grace of God, being confirmed blameless to the end, redemption, possession of the Holy Spirit, new birth, Christ’s sacrifice on one’s behalf, justification, being purchased by Christ, and communion with the body and blood of Christ and thus being one body with Him (lines 313-347).

According to Wilkins, the apostles viewed “the covenant . . . as salvation, because it means fellowship and communion with the triune God. It is [emphasis added] union with Christ in His obedient life, sacrificial, substitutionary death, triumphant resurrection, and glorious ascension and session at the right hand of the Father.” In short, “All in covenant are given all that is true of Christ” (lines 361-365). It is difficult—nay, impossible—to see how “all spiritual blessings in the heavenly places” can be understood to mean anything less than the whole of what Reformed theology tends to call the ordo salutis: foreknowledge, election, effectual calling (regeneration and conversion [conversion = faith and repentance]), justification, sanctification, perseverance, and final glorification. Certainly none of these is a blessing to be found apart from Christ. But if this is so, then it is impossible to avoid the inference, from Wilkins’s statements, that no baptized person will wind up in hell.

Barach, in his 2002 AAPC lecture “Covenant and History,” spoke even more strongly in the same direction. “There is nothing better, nothing more glorious than living in covenant with God, being brought right into the family life of the Triune God . . . .” He then equates being in covenant with being “in Christ.” Shortly he added, “Because we are united with Christ, because He is our covenantal representative, when He was raised from the dead and vindicated by God, we were vindicated by God, justified. In Christ we have sanctification. . . ., we have new life . . . [and] the 6The inference is valid: (1) All baptized are in covenant. (2) All in covenant have all spiritual blessings in heavenly places. (3) Therefore all baptized have all spiritual blessings in heavenly places. More abstractly, if all A are B and all B are C, then all A are C.

Spirit . . . [and] have been glorified.” Who are the “we” in these statements? Barach answered explicitly: “But who shares in those blessings? . . . who is in Christ? The answer that the Bible gives is that those people are in Christ who have been baptized into Christ. . . . there is an objective covenant made with believers and their children. Every baptized person is in covenant with God and is in union then with Christ and with the Triune God. The Bible doesn’t know about a distinction between being internally in the covenant, really in the covenant, and being only externally in the covenant . . . . Every baptized person is truly a member of God’s covenant . . . . every baptized person is in Christ and therefore shares in his new life, . . . and still receives, not only the covenant promises, but also the covenant’s demands and the covenant warnings.” Immediately he added, “Doug [Wilson] is going to be speaking more of the covenant warnings and apostasy from the covenant later on.”

Barach’s words should give us pause. “There is nothing better . . . than living in covenant with God.” Nothing? But apparently it is possible to be in covenant with God and still run the risk of apostasy and going to hell. Would it not be better to be one whom God foreknew, predestined to be conformed to the image of His Son, [effectually] called, justified, and glorified (Romans 8:29-30)–i.e., one who cannot go to hell? (Or have all the Reformed commentators through the centuries misunderstood those verses?) Further, being in covenant means being “in Christ,” i.e., “united with Christ,” and that means being raised from the dead with Him, justified, sanctified, and glorified. So apparently every person in covenant is united with Christ, raised from the dead, justified, sanctified, and glorified. Finally, “Every baptized person is in covenant with God and is in union then with Christ” and therefore raised from the dead with Him, justified, sanctified, and glorified. Every baptized person. If that is so, then either the Reformed world has been quite mistaken in thinking that those raised from the dead, justified, sanctified, and glorified all wind up in heaven, or else every baptized person winds up in heaven.

As I read his words, I hoped Barach was writing in terms of charitable judgment: We express these things without differentiation, charitably counting all baptized as actually united with Christ and partaking of all those benefits, not because each and every one really is, but because with our finite knowledge we cannot safely differentiate. But Barach immediately took that charitable reading away, writing:

. . . we need to be able to tell our congregations . . . and tell individual members . . ., “Jesus died for you personally,” and we mean it, to them, head for head, every one of them. How do we know that? Because they are in covenant with God and we view them as brothers and sisters because that’s who they really are. But we look around the congregation and . . . we do not give them a judgment of charity that says, “Well, I don’t know. Maybe he is a Christian, maybe he isn’t, so I will be charitable. I will regard him as a Christian.” . . . Instead we go by God’s promise. He has said that this person is in Christ and, therefore, believing God’s promise, we treat that person as who he really is, someone who is in Christ.9

One hastens to ask, “Where in Scripture did God say that, e.g., Sally or George was in Christ?” Neither Sally nor George appears in any exhaustive concordance of the Bible. Barach must realize that. How could he say, then, that God “has said that this person is in Christ”? Apparently he inferred it from something. Perhaps he inferred it from Romans 6:1-3, which teaches that whoever has been baptized into Christ has been baptized into His death, buried with Him, and raised with Him. But to use the passage thus is to assume something the Federal Visionists need to prove: that baptized there (and in a host of other places) denotes a liturgical application of water and not inward baptism, of the heart, by the Spirit and not by the letter, made without hands (Romans 2:28-29; Colossians 2:11-12)—a point to which we shall return. To read Paul in Romans 6:1-11 as affirming anything less than the certainty of eternal salvation for all about whom he writes is to misread him badly.

To their credit, both Wilkins and Barach reject the conclusion that no baptized person will wind up in hell. Like Barach (as we saw above in his warning that covenant members can apostatize), Wilkins warned against it. “Thus, when one breaks covenant, it can be truly said that he has turned away from grace and forfeited life, forgiveness, and salvation. . . . The apostate fails to persevere in the grace of God and, thus, has his name removed from the book of life. . . . [T]hose who ultimately prove to be reprobate may be in covenant with God. They may enjoy for a season the blessings of the covenant, including the forgiveness of sins, adoption, possession of the kingdom, sanctification, etc., and yet apostatize and fall short of the grace of God” (lines 371-372, 393-394, 402-405). But this unavoidably implies that perseverance is not one of the “spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ.” Yet Wilkins’s list of such blessings, already mentioned, included being assured that one would be “confirmed to the end blameless” (lines 318-319, citing 1 Corinthians 1:7-8), and it is difficult to imagine what this means other than perseverance. Further, does Wilkins really want to say that perseverance is not one of the blessings in Christ? Where else is it to be found? Wilkins simply cannot, without embracing contradictions, have it both ways: either all who are baptized are in covenant and all who are in covenant have all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ and therefore all who are baptized have all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ—and so will persevere to the end and go to heaven—or some who are baptized will apostatize and wind up in hell and therefore do not have all spiritual blessings in Christ, and, consequently, either being baptized does not necessarily place one in covenant with God or being in covenant with God does not entail having all spiritual blessings in Christ—or both. One simply cannot deny the conclusion of a valid argument without denying at least one of the premises—unless one wishes to reject logic, a topic to which we shall return.

10Barach made just this inference in his lecture “Covenant and Evangelism,” 2002 AAPC lecture transcript, p. 69, lines 7-18, and during Question and Answer Session 1 at the same conference, transcript, p. 122, lines 3-11.

11Barach in “Covenant and Election,” 2002 AAPC lecture transcript, p. 83, line 25, writes, “not every baptized person perseveres to the end.” Douglas Wilson explicitly denied that baptism guaranteed salvation in “Visible and Invisible Church Revisited,” 2002 AAPC, transcript p. 27, line 1: “Just because you are baptized doesn’t mean you are going to go to heaven when you die.” Peter Leithart wrote similarly, “In baptism, God marks me as His own, with His name. . . . It may turn out, of course, that God’s final name for a baptized person is ‘prodigal son’” (Peter J. Leithart, Against Christianity [Moscow, ID: Canon Press, 2003], 91-2). If that is so, then the assurance one can receive from his baptism, apart from faith, is nil, and one is driven back to asking the “unanswerable” question, “Have I sincerely believed?”
Barach is similarly inconsistent. In speaking extensively about election in Ephesians 1, he insisted that the things Paul affirmed there about the “elect” applied “to the entire church, head for head, men, women, and little children at Ephesus,” and he pointed out that Paul used similar language in addressing other churches. Still, he acknowledged that Paul “warns these people . . . about the genuine possibility that they could be excluded from God’s kingdom” and that, according to Acts 20:30, “Paul even knows that not everybody in Ephesus [presumably he means the church there] is going to persevere.” He then explained that it is Christ who is preeminently the elect one and that anyone else’s election is in Him. Then he added, But then who is in Christ? Those who have been incorporated into Christ, brought into Christ, those who have been baptized into Christ. . . . Covenantal election and individual election aren’t actually all that far apart. We can distinguish them perhaps, but we cannot and may not divide them completely.\(^{12}\) What is the connection? The connection has to do with God’s promise, God’s speech to us. God has promised every covenant member that he or she is elect in Christ. . . . When God speaks to his people and calls them elect, he is not simply predicting that this will happen, he is making a pledge to them. . . . His promise is that he administers his salvation to us by speaking to us . . . . And God in the gospel and through baptism promises us that he unites us to Christ . . . . What’s missing in Jesus? In him you have redemption, righteousness, justification, sanctification, the Holy Spirit, glorification, and election. The whole package of salvation . . . is found in Christ.

As if to remove all doubt about what he was asserting, he added, “you don’t need a special, dramatic, revivalistic conversion\(^{13}\) to let you know that you are elect. You had the special experience that God gives you. It was called baptism.”\(^{14}\)

The trouble with Barach’s statements is like that in Wilkins’s. They are inconsistent. If God promises everyone in the covenant that He “administers salvation” to him and unites him to Christ, and if in (union with) Christ are “redemption, righteousness, justification, sanctification, the Holy Spirit, glorification, and election,” indeed, “[t]he whole package of salvation,” then it follows that everyone “in Christ” in the very sense in which Barach is using it here—which is covenantal—will finally be saved. Barach denies the conclusion, but it is difficult to see how it can be avoided as the logical consequence of what he affirms. The only way to do so seems to be to make the truth of God’s “pledge” or “promise” depend on whether its recipient believes it. Had Barach said all along that what God pledged (salvation) was conditioned (not meritoriously but instrumentally) on the \(^{12}\) Thus far I would agree with Barach: all who are individually elected to final salvation are covenantally elect. However, as we shall see momentarily, Barach seems to contradict his earlier acknowledgment that some covenantally elect will be excluded from the kingdom. I.e., he will affirm that all covenantally elect are individually elect. That is the heart of the trouble.

\(^{13}\) Pejorative language (“special, dramatic, revivalistic”) aside, one wonders if Barach thinks you need to be converted, i.e., translated “into a state of grace” (WCF 9.4), at all.

\(^{14}\) Barach, “Covenant and Election,” 2002 AAPC lecture transcript, pp. 87-90. Later he added, “How do I know [I am elect]? I have been baptized into the church, I belong to Christ’s people. . . . How do you know you are in him? God gave you the sign and seal of baptism” (p. 94, lines 4-5, 7). hearer’s believing the promise, he would have spoken consistently with historic Reformed theology. But he did not.\(^\text{15}\)

The Federal Visionists’ view on this is irreconcilable with Romans 8:28-30: “And we know that for those who love God all things work together for good, for those who are called according to his purpose. For those whom he foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son, in order that he might be the firstborn among many brothers. And those whom he predestined he also called, and those whom he called he also justified, and those whom he justified he also glorified.” As Calvinists have insisted for centuries, this “golden chain” is unbroken: All foreknown are predestined; all predestined are called; all called are justified; all justified are glorified; therefore all foreknown are glorified. And who are the foreknown? Those “who love God.” We have seen already that each of these blessings—being foreknown, predestined, called, justified, glorified—is among “all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ.” If, as Wilkins emphatically insists, being baptized puts one in covenant, and being in covenant means having all spiritual blessings in heavenly places, then being baptized means having each of these blessings. But Paul insists that everyone who has any one of them has the last one—glorification—and adds, in verses 31-39, that indeed nothing can separate such a one from the love of God in Christ.

The Vine and the Branches—John 15:1-8 and Apostasy

Federal Visionists\(^\text{16}\) believe Wilkins’s view—that one who has been made a partaker of all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ can yet apostatize and wind up in hell—finds expression in Christ’s parable of the vine and the branches in John 15:1-8.\(^\text{17}\) Thus Wilkins writes, in his colloquium paper, “Jesus here declares that He is the vine and His hearers are branches united to Him. He then exhorts them to continue abiding in Him so that they might bear fruit. If they refuse to abide in Him, they will be fruitless and incur the wrath of the Divine husbandman and, finally, will be cast into the fire. Here then we have those who are joined to Christ in a vital union [emphasis added] (i.e. a union that could and should be fruitful) and yet who end up cursed and condemned” (lines 413-418). Barach emphasizes the reality and vitality of this union by insisting that Jesus “doesn’t say, ‘Every bit of tumbleweed stuck in my branches.’ He says, ‘Every branch in me.’ These branches were not stuck \(^{15}\)Barach did say later in the same lecture, “For those who have been baptized into Christ and who trust in him [emphasis added], who believe God’s promise, your covenantal election just is God’s election of you as an individual into eternal life” (Barach, “Covenant and Election,” 2002 AAPC lecture transcript, p. 92, lines 27-29). But the qualification, “who trust in him,” plunges him right back into the very questions the Federal Visionists want to avoid: Do I really believe? Have I been truly converted? Did I sincerely repent of my sins? If one must still answer such questions before knowing that he is individually (not just covenantally) elect, how can Barach say that the special experience that tells one he is individually elect is his baptism? If he can be baptized but not individually elect because he does not believe, then baptism—apart from conversion (or faith)—simply cannot tell him that he is individually elect.

to the tree with Scotch tape. They were genuinely in Christ . . . "18 Wilson does likewise by saying that the branches had “sap” in them (line 216), and, more fully, “The fruitless branches had sap flowing through them—the same gracious sap that the fruitful branches received.”19 Their use of this passage, however, is fundamentally flawed.

First, there is no better justification for an appeal to “sap” as a sign that the fruitless branches had a “vital” union with Christ than there would be for an appeal to “bark” as a sign that all the branches enjoyed the immunity to disease and pests provided by bark and therefore none could apostatize. The parable mentions neither sap—much less “gracious sap”—nor bark. It is dangerous enough to draw doctrines from parables; it is more dangerous to draw doctrines from details within parables; it is exegetically fatal to draw doctrines from details that are not even there!

Second, they neglect crucial distinctions Jesus draws between the fruit-bearing and nonfruit-bearing branches—distinctions beyond their bearing or not bearing fruit. Although this mistake is exegetically less fundamental than one of reading into the text words that are not there, in this instance it has more serious consequences. The Federal Visionists’ use of this passage implies that fruit-bearing branches could become nonfruit-bearing and thus be cut off and burned. However, according to the parable, every branch that bears fruit the Father “prunes, that it may bear more fruit,” while every branch that bears no fruit the Father “takes away” (v. 2). No branch that bears no fruit abides in the vine (v. 4) (which entails that every branch that bears fruit abides in the vine), but every branch that abides in the vine “bears much fruit” (v. 5). Thus, every branch that bears fruit abides in the vine, and every branch that abides in the vine bears fruit, while every branch that does not bear fruit does not abide in the vine, and every branch that does not abide in the vine does not bear fruit. Jesus’ words make it impossible for a fruit-bearing branch to become a nonfruit-bearing branch and thus to be cut off and burned. Far from a warning that fruit bearers might apostatize and go to hell, this parable is a marvelous assurance that fruit bearers will be kept by the power of God to salvation (1 Peter 1:5).

Third, what does it mean for branches to abide in the vine (Christ)? Clearly it does not mean the same thing as to be a branch in the vine, for Christ explicitly distinguishes between branches in the vine that abide and branches in the vine that do not abide. Norman Shepherd interpreted not abiding as denying Christ and becoming disobedient.20 However, that this is not so should be clear from the ensuing experience of Peter, who, later in the same night on which he heard Christ say to him (and the other apostles—significantly excluding Judas), “Already you are clean” (v. 3), would deny Christ three times and disobey Him by cutting off the ear of the high priest’s servant (18:17, 25-27, 10). Yet Peter, far from being cut off and cast out to be burned (the fate of every branch that does not abide), was confirmed in the faith and made one of the chief apostles. What, then, does it mean to abide in the vine—to abide in Christ? The best interpretive pointer we have in the immediate context is what Christ says in 15:7: “If you abide in me, and my words abide in you, ask whatever you wish, and it will be done for you.” The association between the apostles’ abiding in Christ and His words’ abiding in them implies that abiding in Christ means believing in Him—that is, believing the words of the gospel. Another crucial interpretive pointer comes from a different context, but still in the words of Jesus:

Truly, truly, I say to you, unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, you have no life in you. Whoever feeds on my flesh and drinks my blood has eternal life, and I will raise him up on the last day. For my flesh is true food, and my blood is true drink. Whoever feeds on my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him. [John 6:53-56]

Many of His disciples were offended at this shocking, gruesome statement. In response, Jesus explained, “It is the Spirit who gives life; the flesh is of no avail. The words that I have spoken to you are spirit and life. But there are some of you who do not believe” (verses 63-64). When some disciples forsook Him and He asked the twelve, “Do you want to go away as well?”, “Simon Peter answered him, ‘Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life, and we have believed, and have come to know, that you are the Holy One of God’” (verses 67-69). That is, the one who feeds on Christ’s flesh and drinks His blood (and therefore has eternal life) is precisely the one who believes (cf. John 3:16-18; 6:47: “Truly, truly, I say to you, whoever believes in the Son of God has eternal life.”). It is not physical eating of the Lord’s Supper (or physical baptism) but faith that unites one to (causes one to abide in) Christ. Abiding in Christ is precisely having faith in Him. And--and this is important in the debate over the Federal Vision--this faith is not bare assent but fruit-bearing assent: “Whoever abides in me and I in him, he it is that bears much fruit . . .” (v. 7).

21John Calvin made this point in Institutes, 4.17.33-34, where in opposition to the “false interpretation of the sacramental eating . . . that even the impious and the wicked eat Christ’s body, however estranged from him they may be,” he argued that all whose are devoid of Christ’s Spirit can no more eat Christ’s flesh than drink wine that has no taste. Surely, Christ is too unworthy torn apart if his body, lifeless and powerless, is prostituted to unbelievers. And this is contradicted by his plain words: “Whosoever will eat my flesh and drink my blood will abide in me and I in him” [John 6:56]. . . I hold that men bear away from this Sacrament no more than they gather with the vessel of faith, . . . the wicked go away empty after outward participation in it. . . . in the case of unbelievers their own hardness is the hindrance which prevents Christ from coming into them. . . . Anyone who desires our salvation to be helped by this Sacrament will find nothing more fitting than that believers, led to the well [cf. John 4:6-15], may draw life from the Son of God. [Emphases added.]

Calvin went on to express his agreement with Augustine that the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper—eating Christ’s flesh and drinking His blood—actually imparted life only to him who, as Augustine put it, “received the power of the Sacrament, not only the visible Sacrament; and indeed inwardly, not outwardly; and who eats with the heart, not who presses with the teeth.” From this, Calvin reasoned, “it follows that unbelievers communicate only in a visible symbol,” since “the Sacrament is one thing, the power of the Sacrament, another,” or, as Augustine put it, “he who does not abide in Christ and in whom Christ does not abide, doubtless does not spiritually eat his flesh or drink his blood, although me may carnally and visibly press the sign of the body and blood with his teeth.” “Let my readers weigh this antithesis between eating sacramentally and reality,” Calvin went on, “and no doubt will remain,” and then he quoted Augustine again, that “It is not what is seen, then, but what is believed, that feeds.” Calvin concluded, “sacramental eating, where unbelief closes the door to the reality, has no more value than visible or outward eating. . . . It is clear . . . that those who only sacramentally eat Christ’s body, which cannot be separated from its power, are deprived of its true and real eating; and that there is here no reason to lose faith in the promises of God, who does not stop the rain from falling from heaven, although rocks and stones do not receive the moisture of the rain.”

22If there is such a thing; see Proverbs 23:7, AV, and James 2:14-26.
Fourth, the Federal Visionists mistakenly object to such an interpretation on the grounds that it makes the warnings of the passage useless. Wilkins wrote:

Often this passage is interpreted along these lines: There are two kinds of branches. Some branches are not really in Christ “in a saving way,” but only in an external sense—whatever fruit they bear is not genuine and they will eventually be destroyed. Other branches are truly joined to Christ inwardly and savingly, and they bear more and more fruit as they are pruned and cultivated by the Father.” As Norman Shepherd has noted, “If this distinction is in the text, it is difficult to see what the point of the warning is. The outward (“external”) branches cannot profit from it, because they cannot in any case bear genuine fruit. They are not related to Christ inwardly and draw no life from him. The inward branches do not need the warning, because they are vitalized by Christ and therefore cannot help but bear good fruit. Cultivation by the Father, with its attendant blessing, is guaranteed.”

But this argument is unconvincing regarding both sorts of branches. It ignores the possibility of conversion for the “outward” branches—those “in” but not “abiding in” the vine. Christ said that branches that did not bear fruit would be removed, cast away, and burned; He did not mention that some fruitless branches might be converted and become fruit bearing before that. Yet unless each and every one of the elect is converted at the moment of conception, so that there is never a time in his life when he does not abide in Christ and bear fruit, if anyone winds up in heaven it must be because once-fruitless branches are converted into fruitful ones—because branches (whether in or out of the vine) that once did not abide in Christ are converted and begin to abide (that is, believe) in Him. Just such a possibility is implicit in Christ’s words, “Already you are clean” (v. 3)—implying that some who are not already will be later. The powerful, converting Word has already worked regeneration in them (2 Peter 1:23); by that new birth they have been made to abide in Christ; by that abiding they have been made to bear fruit. So long as conversion is possible, it is the task of the evangelist to preach the warnings of Scripture as instruments by which the Spirit of God might renew the lost by granting them faith. The warning, then, is not lost on the lost. If they do not begin to abide in the vine, they will be cut off and cast away for burning. Neither is the warning lost on the saved, for it may be an instrument by which God causes them to persevere.

Ironically, the Federal Visionists bemoan, as Shepherd put it, “the fact that the covenant is prevailingly viewed from the perspective of election, rather than election from the perspective of the covenant.” But while, hypothetically and abstractly, the warning might seem wasted on the elect—that is, if Richard abides in Christ he will bear fruit, be pruned, and go to heaven, so it matters not whether he ever hears the warning—concretely the warning is not wasted, because neither the preacher nor the hearer knows, a priori or infallibly, what Shepherd’s argument requires him to know.

24Shepherd, “Covenant Context,” 65. Wilson, in the same article in which he wrote of the “gracious sap” in all the branches, likewise wrote, “we are to view election through the lens of the covenant rather than the other way around” (“Objectivity of the Covenant,” 4).
to make the warning useless: whether Richard is elect.\textsuperscript{25} It is not that Richard cannot know this, but that he may come to know it only as an inference from his believing and bearing fruit. As \textit{WCF} 18.2 puts it, assurance of salvation is . . . an infallible assurance of faith founded upon the divine truth of the promises of salvation [Hebrews 6:17-18], the inward evidence of those graces unto which these promises are made [2 Peter 1:4-5, 10-11; 1 John 2:3; 3:14; 2 Corinthians 1:12], the testimony of the Spirit of adoption witnessing with our spirits that we are the children of God [Romans 8:15-16], which Spirit is the earnest of our inheritance, whereby we are sealed to the day of redemption [Ephesians 1:13-14; 4:30; 2 Corinthians 1:21-22].

The Federal Visionists’ passion for viewing election through the lens of the covenant rather than vice versa robs believers of the very assurance they intend to provide for them. The great benefit of embracing Wilkins’s view of covenant and baptism\textsuperscript{26} is purported to be delivering people from morbid introspection and giving them an objective, outward sign that assures them of their salvation.\textsuperscript{27} But what the Federal Visionists give with one hand they take away with the other. Wilkins wrote, “We cannot judge men based upon the secret decrees of God or the hidden operations of the Spirit”–as if traditional Reformed theology said otherwise. But no Reformed theologian has said that we are to “judge men based upon the secret decrees of God.” Reformed theologians, with Jesus, have insisted that we know men by their fruits (Matthew 7:15-20; John 15:1-11). With James they have said, “I will show you my faith by my works” (James 2:18). Fruits–works–are the \textit{revealed effects} of the secret causes that are God’s elective decree and effectual call (regeneration, enlightenment, the gifts of faith and repentance). Wilkins’s insistence that a baptized covenant member can apostatize and go to hell–about which he is absolutely right–demolishes the assurance any baptized covenant member can have of his salvation from his baptism and covenant membership in isolation from answering the very kinds of questions he says cannot be answered: “Questions like, ‘Have you truly believed?’; ‘Have you sincerely repented?’; ‘Do you have a new heart?’; ‘Have you been truly converted?’; etc.”\textsuperscript{28} If being a branch in the vine–i.e., being objectively in the covenant–does not guarantee final salvation (and it certainly does not), it is no proper basis of assurance. The “objectivity of the covenant” on which the Federal Visionists so adamantly insist does not serve their intended purpose. Wilson acknowledges that one cannot infer “individual election” from “covenantal election” and says \textsuperscript{25} Shepherd’s and Wilkins’s objection rests on a confusion familiar to logicians: Some people . . . disparage the syllogism on the ground that it teaches nothing new. The conclusion is already contained in the premises.

Of course the conclusion is contained in the premises; but the way these people make their complaint depends on the equivocal use of the word \textit{contained}. The conclusion is always logically contained [if the syllogism is valid], but it is not always contained psychologically. That is to say, a person by putting together two pieces of information he knows may derive a third proposition he has not previously been aware of.

that the “elect” (in context, the individually elect) cannot lose their salvation. But he offers no way for one to tell whether he is individually elect (and so assured of salvation) or only covenantally elect (and so in danger of apostasy and winding up in hell). Rather, he says, “You can be on the tree, someone can be on the tree right next to you, and he is as much on the tree as you are, he’s as much a partaker of Christ as you are, he is as much a member of Christ as you are, and he is cut away and you are not . . . .”\(^{30}\) Ironically, the assurance the Federal Visionists lose while seeking to gain it by turning from election to covenant the Westminster Divines preserved precisely by their focus on election and its fruits. In the concluding paragraph of their chapter “Of God’s Eternal Decree” they wrote:

> The doctrine of this high mystery of predestination is to be handled with special prudence and care [Romans 9:20; 11:33; Deuteronomy 29:29], that men, attending the will of God revealed in His Word, and yielding obedience thereunto, may, from the certainty of their effectual vocation, be assured of their eternal election [2 Peter 1:10]. So shall this doctrine afford matter of praise, reverence, and admiration of God [Ephesians 1:6; Romans 11:33]; and of humility, diligence, and abundant consolation to all that sincerely obey the Gospel [Romans 11:5-6, 20; 2 Peter 1:10; Romans 8:33; Luke 10:20]. \[WCF 3.8, emphases added\]

By “the will of God revealed in His Word” the Divines meant not His decretive will (in this context, election) but His moral will (the law), the believer’s obedience to which (i.e., his fruit) is a sign of his effectual calling and hence of his election. Their reasoning was identical to that of the Synod of Dort, which wrote:

> The elect, in due time, though in various degrees and in different measures, attain the assurance of this their eternal and unchangeable election, not by inquisitively prying into the secret and deep things of God, but by observing in themselves, with a spiritual joy and holy pleasure, the infallible fruits of election pointed out in the Word of God; such as a true faith in Christ, filial fear, a godly sorrow for sin, a hungering and thirsting after righteousness, etc.\(^{31}\)

Structural Failures in Argument

In many instances, I am convinced, the Federal Visionists fall into faulty conclusions because they structure their arguments poorly. This criticism is implicit in the two preceding subsections, but consider one more example, namely, the structure of Barach’s argument in “Covenant and Election.”\(^{32}\)

\(^{30}\)Wilson, “Visible and Invisible Church Revisited,” p. 33, lines 7-8, and p. 34, lines 17-21.

\(^{31}\)Canons of the Synod of Dort, 1.12; in Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, 3 vols., 4th ed. (1877; reprint edition, Grand Rapids: Baker, 1977), 3:581-97, at 583-4; emphasis added. Because the Conclusion of the Canons went to considerable lengths to warn against the Remonstrants’ misuse of the doctrine of election to impugn the justice of God, it has become commonplace to think that their exhortation to believers “to conduct themselves piously and religiously in handling this doctrine” (Schaff, 597) and the Westminster Divines’ exhortation to handle the doctrine “with special prudence and care” \[WCF 3.8\] imply that the doctrine holds more danger of abuse than promise of comfort. That was certainly not the belief of the authors of either document.

\(^{32}\)Barach delivered this message in slightly different forms but with the same essential structure in his 2002 and After navigating through that lecture repeatedly, as he delivered it at the 2003 AAPC, I am compelled to see his argument as follows:

a. God predestines some to eternal glory (lines 87-88).
b. If Scripture did not tell us who those elect to eternal glory are, that truth would be useless to us (lines 91-98).
c. But Scripture tells us who they are (lines 100, 127, 131-132).
d. The elect to eternal glory are not (as Arminians think) merely a general category or class of people (lines 141-149).
e. The elect to eternal glory are not (as some Calvinists think) the only people in the covenant (lines 151-153, 174-176, 197-210, 215, 225-233).
f. Not all in covenant are elect to eternal glory (lines 233, 241-242, 262).
g. God’s faithful people, a remnant, are the elect to eternal glory (lines 268-269, 272).

But:

h. The whole of the covenant people is elect [to eternal glory?] (lines 271, 389-391, 452-454).
i. Election [to eternal glory?] of the whole implies election [to eternal glory?] of each member (lines 319-321, 359-367).
j. Election [to eternal glory?] is of those “in Christ” (or is it that those “in Christ” are elect [to eternal glory?]) (lines 381-383).
k. Christ is the elect [to eternal glory] One (line 384).
l. Some elect [to eternal glory?] may apostatize and go to hell (lines 406-407, 603-606), namely, those whom God predestines to do so (line 622).
m. All baptized persons are in the covenant and therefore in Christ (lines 590-597) (and therefore elect to eternal glory?).

This brief, condensed recitation of Barach’s flow of thought makes it immediately clear that there are significant problems with it. The bracketed instances of the words to eternal glory, each followed by a question mark, indicate points at which it is simply impossible to tell, from the context of Barach’s own words, whether election denotes election to eternal glory or election simply to membership in the covenant people. That is, equivocation vitiates the whole of Barach’s treatment of the relationship between covenant and election, because he fails to use election in the same sense through every step. More significantly, Barach loses track of the problem he set out to solve: how do we know 2003 AAPC appearances, and in a condensed form in his colloquium paper. I interact here with the 2003 AAPC version both because the structural difficulties are more obvious there than in the others and because that is the version I was reading when the difficulties first became clear to me.

36Colloquium version, lines 15-17.
37Colloquium version, lines 49-50.
38The concluding paragraphs of Fowler White’s “Covenant and Apostasy,” chapter 15 above, offer significant help along these lines. who are elect to eternal glory? If God does not tell us who they are, he has already said, the doctrine of election is useless. But when all is said and done, he himself never can tell us who are the elect to eternal glory—except to say that they are the faithful remnant. But how are they to be identified? By their membership in the covenant? No, for some in covenant, he says, are not elect to eternal glory—even though the whole covenant people is elect in some sense.

It appears, in short, that Barach wants to identify the elect to eternal glory as those who are in covenant, but he cannot. The result is that those elect to eternal glory remain unidentified, even on Barach’s scheme. But according to him, if that is so, the doctrine of election becomes useless.

In contrast, as we have seen, the Westminster Confession identifies the elect by reference not to their covenant membership but to the fruit of the Spirit in their lives, saying “that men, attending the will of God revealed in His Word, and yielding obedience thereunto, may, from the certainty of their effectual vocation, be assured of their eternal election [2 Peter 1:10].” Far from the doctrine’s being useless, it thus “afford[s] matter of praise, reverence, and admiration of God [Ephesians 1:6; Romans 11:33]; and of humility, diligence, and abundant consolation to all that sincerely obey the Gospel [Romans 11:5-6, 20; 2 Peter 1:10; Romans 8:33; Luke 10:20]” (WCF 3.8, emphases added).

Although time and space prohibit developing other examples, I believe similar structural failures occur repeatedly in other Federal Vision arguments. Barach’s failure in all of this is rooted in his failure to use his terms in the same sense from premise to premise in his argument, and this leads to a criticism not of particular doctrines or exegeses by the Federal Visionists but of a crucial element of their whole theological method.

The Root of the Problem

The Federal Visionists tend to object to their statements’ being subjected to logical critique (testing for consistency) and logical inferences (leading to conclusions that they do not wish to embrace). At least Schlissel, as can be seen from chapter 3, “A New Way of Seeing?”, in this volume, and other writings, seems hostile to systematic theology.\(^\text{39}\) I suspect that this objection to logical Schlissel’s 2002 Auburn Avenue Pastors’ Conference lecture “Covenant Reading.” Schlissel posted his own edited version of that address at www.christian-torah.com/covenantreading.pdf. There he wrote, Among the biblical Jewish conceptions of the Word of God is that the Word of God comes to them and owns them. “The very idea of the word of God,” wrote one modern theologian, “is different for the biblical Jew than it is for the Greek or the Hellenic-minded Christian. The word of God seems to interest us only to the extent that it reveals certain truths inaccessible to human reason. These truths themselves are conceived as separate doctrinal statements, and the word of God is finally reduced to a collection of formulas. They are detached from it, moreover, so that they can be reorganized into a more logically satisfactory sequence, even to the point of retouching them or remodeling them to make them clearer and more precise. After that the only thing that remains of the divine word seems to be a sort of residuum, a kind of conjunctive that of itself has no interest.” In other words, we suck the doctrine out with our theological vacuum cleaner. Whatever is left over we just throw away, as if it was of no use.

The author continues: “Whether we realize it or not, the result is that the word of God appears as a sort of nondescript hodge-podge from which the professional theologian extracts, like a mineral out of its matrix, small but precious bits of knowledge which it is his job to clarify and systematize. In this view the word of God is no longer anything but an elementary, rough, and confused presentation of more or less shrouded truth.
systematization—and to its use as a critical tool to test for falsehood by uncovering logical inconsistency—rests, for at least some of them, on their embrace of Cornelius Van Til’s epistemology and apologetic, an important element of which is reticence as to (or perhaps even hostility to) the use of logic in theology. But antipathy to logic is contrary both to Scripture (Isaiah 5:29: “Woe to those who call evil good and good evil, who put darkness for light and light for darkness, who put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter!”) and to the overwhelming practice of Reformed theologians.

Not the least of these, John Calvin, readily used syllogistic logic in his exegesis of Scripture. In interpreting the decision of the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15) Calvin wrote, “The Lord’s command is that you should not wound a weak brother; you cannot eat meat offered to idols, things strangled, and blood, without offending weak brethren. Therefore we command you in the Word of the Lord not to eat with offense.” His commitment to logic in general and to the law of contradiction in particular is inherent in his wry, ironic comment, “Now, for my part, when there is a dispute concerning anything, I am stupid enough to refer everything back to the definition itself, which is the

The theologian’s task is to bring them out and to put them in order. But for the pious Jew [i.e., the biblical Jew in the Bible], who mediated the divine word at the end of all that we call the Old Testament, the divine word signified an intense living reality. It is not merely an idea. It is even less a proposition. It is God speaking to us, and God in speaking to us does not make himself a theology professor.” Does that explanation mean that we don’t need theology professors? No, but based on a Hellenic notion, our seminars treat theology and practical theology as separate departments of study. The mistaken idea is that real theology is not practical, so we invent something called practical theology, which is theology we can do something with.

In neither document did Schlissel identify the “modern theologian” or “gleg author” who is the source of the quotation. In an e-mail to me of July 5, 2003, Schlissel identified him as Louis Bouyer and the source as Bouyer’s Eucharist: Theology and Spirituality of the Eucharist (South Bend: University of Notre Dame Press, 1968). We may question the prudence of trusting this source on theological method when we learn that he is author also of The Spirit and Forms of Protestantism (1956; New York: Scepter Publishers, 2002 reprint), in which he argues “that the only way to safeguard the positive principles of the Reformation is through the Catholic Church. For only in the Catholic Church are the positive principles the Reformation affirmed found without the negative elements the Reformers mistakenly affixed to them” (Mark Brumley, “Why Only Catholicism Can Make Protestantism Work: Louis Bouyer on the Reformation,” at www.catholiceducation.org/articles/apologetics/ap0097.html, reprinted from Brumley, “Why Only Catholicism Can Make Protestantism Work: Louis Bouyer on the Reformation,” Catholic Dossier, vol. 7, no. 5 (September-October 2001): 30-35. Brumley’s review goes on to say that Bouyer wrote that Catholicism affirmed sola gratia, sola fide, and even sola Scriptura (though he defines each very differently from how Protestantism does!), though he admits that Catholicism rejects extrinsic justification and the belief that the Word of God in an authoritative form is found only in the Bible. Bouyer was a convert to Catholicism from Protestantism, and Brumley’s like conversion came from reading Bouyer’s Spirit and Forms of Protestantism.

For discussion of the role of logic in theology, or antipathy toward its use, in the controversy between Herman Hoeksema and Klaas Schilder in Dutch Reformed circles in the mid-twentieth century, see Bernard Woudenberg, The Hoeksema and Schilder Debate, online at http://www.sibd.org/sibd/hookeisma/, especially articles 14-17 and 30. Indeed, all forty-four of Woudenberg’s essays at that site are tremendously helpful for understanding not only that earlier debate but also the present one. See also John W. Robbins, Cornelius Van Til: The Man and the Myth, Trinity Papers 15 (Unicoi, TN: Trinity Foundation, 1986). Roelof Jansen criticizes Woudenberg’s articles in his introduction to Jelle Faber’s American Secession Theologians on Covenant and Baptism and Klaas Schilder’s Extra-Scriptural Binding: A New Danger (bound together; Pella, IA: Inheritance Publications, 1996).

Insistence on proper definition and rejection of equivocation lay at the heart of his arguments against the Lutheran doctrine of consubstantiation.

In refuting one argument for that doctrine he complained, “if this evasion is granted, we are not permitted to reason from the general to the particular”–i.e., syllogistic, deductive logic must be abandoned, and that Calvin was not willing to do. Shortly he wrote, against those who asserted the same doctrine, “Madman, why do you demand that God’s power make flesh to be and not to be flesh at the same time! It is as if you insisted that he make light to be both light and darkness at the same time! But he wills light to be light; darkness, darkness; and flesh, flesh. Indeed, when he pleases he will turn darkness into light and light into darkness; but when you require that light and darkness not differ, what else are you doing than perverting the order of God’s wisdom”–i.e., abandoning the law of contradiction. Against those who thought it was enough, in arguing, simply to assume the conclusion, he wrote, “this is the very point of their quarrel with us–so far is it from obtaining the place of a principle!” In short, Calvin was committed to logic and saw it as indispensable to proper exegesis and theology.

Commitment to logic among the Westminster Divines was so strong that they required, in The Presbyterial Form of Church Government’s “Directory for the Ordination of Ministers,” that when a candidate stood for ordination to the ministry of the Word, “He shall be examined touching his skill in the original tongues, and his trial to be made by reading the Hebrew and Greek Testaments, and rendering some portion of some into Latin; and if he be defective in them, enquiry shall be made more strictly after his other learning, and whether he hath skill in logick and philosophy.” They recognized that logic could aid in exegesis by preventing the affirmation of mutually contradictory interpretations (especially likely for one deficient in knowledge of the original language) of different passages. This same concern is implicit in their affirming that “the consent of all the parts” of Scripture is one of those “arguments whereby it doth abundantly evidence itself to be the Word of God” (WCF 1.5). And it will not do for the Federal Visionists to call this Enlightenment rationalism–Calvin, the Westminster Divines, even Francis Turretin long predated the Enlightenment.

Anyone who embraces this historic commitment of the Reformed faith and its great theologians claims as proper to the nature of his body; will not a new definition of body then have to be coined?” And “they make a spirit out of Christ’s flesh. And not content with this, they endow it with utterly contrary qualities.”), 30 (“Christ’s 47Calvin’s Barthian editor McNeill was quite mistaken when, in I.xviii.3n6 (p. 234), he wrote that by “consciously mak[ing] self-contradictory statements about God ‘willing’ what he ‘forbids,’ yet with a will that remains ‘one and simple’,” “Logic is thus subordinated to Scripture, and, characteristically for Calvin, is rejected as a device for understanding what is beyond the limits of the revealed mysteries.” Whether McNeill knew it or not, Calvin knew that affirming something in one sense and denying it in another was not contradiction. He distinguished between God’s decretive (secret) will and His moral (revealed) will (cf. I.xvii.1-3). Consequently he could affirm that God could will decretively what He forbade morally.

48And with him the other major early Reformed theologians, who also insisted on logic. to logic must greet the Federal Visionists’ objections, in principle, to logical critique of their statements with skeptical concern. Wilson, who co-authored an introductory text on logic,\(^5\) ought to know better. Yet, in his overview paper for this volume, he seeks to shield the Federal Visionists’ inconsistent assertions about how covenant, election, salvation, baptism, and assurance are related from criticism by writing,

> In faith, we want to say that children of believers are saved. But we are not making a categorical statement of the “All P are Q” kind. We are saying that we believe God’s statements and promises concerning covenant children, and we think others should believe them, too. Now these promises (in all our theological systems) have apparent instances of non-fulfillment. How are we to account for this? We all acknowledge that some of our children grow up and depart from the living God. We see the same kind of thing with adult converts. Many of them have fallen away also. Have the promises of God fallen to the ground in either instance?

The question of levels of discourse is central in understanding this. On one level, all of us confess that some children of believers are reprobate, and will eventually fall away. On another level of discourse, we say that God is God to our children. In preaching, in catechesis, in liturgy, the second level of discourse is operative. This level is operative because faith in the promises requires it. But an important point to note is that we are not saying contradictory things within one level of discourse. Nor are we denying the first level of discourse.\(^6\)

Wilson ought to know that children of believers are saved simply is a categorical statement. Between the categories (a) children of believers and (b) people who are saved, there can be only four relationships: (1) All children of believers are people who are saved [All a are b.]. (2) No children of believers are people who are saved [No a are b.]. (3) Some children of believers are people who are saved [Some a are b.]. (4) Some children of believers are not people who are saved [Some a are not b.]. If, when the Federal Visionists, as part of their strategy to deliver people from “unanswerable” questions about whether they are true believers and direct them instead to the objectivity of the covenant, insist that the children of believers are saved (as Schlissel wrote on the whiteboard during discussion at the colloquium),\(^5\) then they must be asserting either (1) or (3) above. If they are asserting (1), then it follows inexorably that no children of believers are not saved, i.e., that (2) and
(4) are false, and they have provided (rightly or wrongly—but at least validly) the assurance they

\(^5\)To his credit and my relief, Schlissel, in the appendix to chapter 3, backed off from such unqualified language, where he wrote that he thinks Federal Visionists and their critics “could meet, especially if the critical portion of the Berkhof/De Jong summation [which he outlined earlier in the addendum] is heartily affirmed, viz., that the children presented for baptism by believing parents will, as a rule, under faithful covenant administration, find full realization of all God’s promises in the communion of life. How close can we get before much of the aftermath appears to be a forbidden ‘quarrelling about words’?” (lines 891-894). I am not persuaded, however, that Schlissel is correct there in asserting that the Berkhof/De Jong summation “is virtually indistinguishable from what was taught in Monroe, except that De Jong and Berkhof may be slightly less clear in their sentiments due to ‘hedging’” (lines 872-873). intend. But if they are asserting (3), then they can infer absolutely nothing about the truth of (4), and their attempt to provide assurance by appeal to the objectivity of the covenant collapses.

Wilson’s attempt to justify such inconsistencies by appeal to “levels of discourse” does not suffice.
What it really leads to is precisely the sort of upper-story/lower-story dualism against which the late Francis Schaeffer indefatigably warned. Does Wilson, after all, mean to tell us that at one “level of discourse”—whatever that means—all children of believers are saved, while at another “level of discourse” some are not saved? What parents crave regarding their children is not “Well, on this level discourse, your child is saved, but on another level, he might not be.” What fretting church members crave regarding their own assurance is not “Well, on this level of discourse, your baptism assures you that you’re saved, but on another level it doesn’t.” Such equivocation is not the responsibility of the minister of the Word of God, who is called to sound a clear trumpet (1 Corinthians 14:8), whose “Yes” should be “Yes” and whose “No” should be “No” (Matthew 5:37), whose message is to be “not Yes and No, but . . . always Yes” because in Christ “all [not just some!] of the promises of God” are “Yes” and “Amen” (2 Corinthians 1:19-20). No one will spend eternity blessed in heaven in one “level of discourse” and cursed in hell in another.

The Federal Visionists have not provided any promises of God of type (1) (All a are b.) for the salvation of the children of believers (or of baptized persons). Consequently it is of no use for Wilson to say, “we believe God’s statements and promises concerning covenant children, and we think others should believe them, too,” and think that is adequate ground for assuring believers, because of the objectivity of the covenant, of their children’s salvation (or for assuring baptized persons of their own). A major part of this debate is precisely over whether indeed the Bible does teach that all children of believers (or all baptized persons) are saved; it will not do simply to assume that conclusion as a premise. Neither is it of use for Wilson to say, “these promises (in all our theological systems) have apparent instances of non-fulfillment.” That in itself assumes what the Federal Visionists must prove—that God has promised the salvation of all children of believers (or all baptized persons). For if instead God has promised the salvation of only some children of believers (and of some baptized persons), then the damnation of some (of either) cannot be raised as an instance of the non-fulfillment of His promises. Scripture clearly teaches us that all God’s promises are perfectly fulfilled (2 Corinthians 1:20; Titus 1:2; Hebrews 6:13-20). If it appears to us that one of them goes finally unfulfilled, then we have misunderstood either the promise (as I believe the Federal Visionists do God’s promises regarding believers’ children and the baptized) or the phenomena (i.e., the child’s parents or the baptized were not really believers). That is, we have mistaken either the major or the minor premise (or both). Take the syllogism, (i) All children of believers are people who are saved; (ii) Richard is a child of believers; (iii) Therefore Richard is saved. In their attempt to comfort parents by reference to the objectivity of the covenant, the Federal Visionists want to affirm this. But they know that, as Wilson put it, “some of our children grow up and depart from the living God.” Consequently, when challenged, they (rightly, though inconsistently!) shrink back from the conclusion. But they can avoid the conclusion only if they deny one of the premises. When Wilson writes that “some of our children grow up and depart from the living God,” he uses our to denote believers, so he cannot deny (ii) (the minor premise). He must then deny (i) (the major premise). He must confess that it is really true that only (i’) some children of believers are saved. But from (i’) and (ii) nothing follows, for nothing in the premises tells us whether Richard is among those children of believers who are saved or those who are not.
Federal Vision theology will continue to be unstable and plagued with error so long as its adherents continue to resist the universal application of logic to theology—which is, in the final analysis, all that is meant by systematic theology.

Conclusion

There are other items I could wish to address at some length here, but they will have to await 52 The common penchant for opposing “biblical theology” and “systematic theology,” as if the latter were dedicated to systematization and the former simply to letting the Bible speak for itself in its redemptive-historical narrative, is naïve. Biblical theology and systematic theology both systematize; they simply systematize different things and in different categories.

53 Two examples: [a] I believe many of the Scripture passages on which the Federal Visionists rely for their theology of baptism use the term (or its cognates) to denote not the rite but the spiritual reality signified by it (for instance, Romans 6:1ff; 1 Peter 3:21). The nineteenth-century Presbyterian James Wilkinson Dale’s five-volume study on baptism persuades me that in many instances the original readers of the New Testament would not have taken baptizo or baptism to denote the rite at all. See Dale, Christ and Patristic Baptism: An Inquiry into the Meaning of the Word as Determined by the Usage of the Holy Scriptures and Patristic Writers (1874), Classic Baptism: An Inquiry into the Meaning of the Word as Determined by the Usage of Classical Greek Writers (1867), Johannic Baptism: An Inquiry into the Meaning of the Word as Determined by the Usage of the Holy Scriptures (1898), and Judaic Baptism: An Inquiry into the Meaning of the Word as Determined by the Usage of Jewish and Patristic Writers (1869) (all reprinted, Phillipsburg, NJ: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1995, 1989, 1993, and 1991, respectively). Peter Leithart, who is ordinarily much too good a theologian and exegete to make this mistake, simply begged the question when he wrote, “Paul wrote that Christians have all been united to Christ in His death and resurrection because they have all been baptized (Rom. 6). Many preachers cannot take Paul at his word. ‘Baptism’ doesn’t refer to the ‘sign’ of water but to the ‘thing’ that the water symbolizes. Paul wasn’t referring to the baptismal rite itself. He wasn’t telling the Romans that they were dead and risen with Christ by baptism, but by that to which baptism points.” [para] Which raises three basic questions: First, if he didn’t mean baptism, why did he say baptism? Second, how do these commentators know that Paul wasn’t referring to baptism? Third, and most fundamentally, what kind of assumptions about the world drive this interpretation? Why would anyone doubt that Paul is talking about water?” (Peter Leithart, “Starting Before the Beginning,” Credenda/Agenda, 14/6, online at http://www.credenda.org/issues/14-6liturgia.php.) Leithart’s case here depends on assuming that the rite is more fundamental in the term’s usage than the transforming experience or overwhelming influence that the rite signifies. But if Dale’s arguments are sound—and I am persuaded that they are—the opposite is true. To answer Leithart’s questions: First, Paul did mean baptism—and the term baptism did not mean, primarily, a ritual application of water. Second, commentators argue in two ways that in Romans 6:1ff baptism does not denote the rite: (a) consistent application of that sense in the immediate context (verses 1-10) would yield the conclusion (contrary to other passages of Scripture) that all, without exception, who undergo the rite are regenerate, converted, justified, sanctified, and finally glorified, and (b) Paul himself, who certainly views circumcision and baptism as type and antitype (Colossians 2:11-12), had already written in the same epistle that it was not the rite of circumcision but the spiritual reality designated by it that differentiated the true (inward) Jew from the false (outward) Jew (Romans 2:28-29). It stands to reason that he would affirm the same of baptism. The commentators do not, pace Leithart’s tacit implication, simply truck in their conclusion without reason. Third, the assumptions (if we may call them that) that drive that interpretation are founded on sober attention to Biblical teaching about the difference between rites (sacraments) and realities (things signified), per, e.g., Isaiah 1:10-19; 29:13; Ezekiel 33:31; Matthew 15:8-9.

[b] I am convinced that Rich Lusk’s (following Norman Shepherd’s in The Call of Grace: How the Covenant Illuminates Salvation and Evangelism [Phillipsburg, NJ: Presbyterian & Reformed Publishing, 2000] rejection of the covenant of works (not a mere reworking of it, as he chose to call it in his title to chapter 10), by whatever name (covenant of life, covenant of creation), will, if carried through, require a wholesale revision of the entire Westminsterian soteriology, for that covenant plays a crucial role in Westminster’s understanding of how Christ, in another time and venue. Because my comments above have been largely critical, I wish to end by repeating the warm sympathy I expressed at the start of this chapter for the concerns that I believe drive the Federal Visionists. It is especially important that covenantal theology be restored to its rightful place at the very heart of Reformed theology and practice. Success at that would do much to help our churches overcome the common resistance to church discipline in the milieu of our American individualist “liberty” that as often as not is merely a “cloak for vice” (1 Peter 2:16; cf. Galatians 5:13). Such discipline is of the very essence of covenantalism. It was a hallmark of Reformed churches in the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries in Europe, Britain, and North America. Its scarcity in American churches is doubtless a fruit of the impact of the revivalism and individualism of early nineteenth-century American experience, especially as expressed in the Second Great Awakening. It is also a symptom of the scarcity of a truly covenantal understanding of every aspect of the Christian life in family, church, and society. To the extent that the Federal Visionists are rousing the Reformed community, or at least parts of it, from a long and costly slumber, we can only be thankful.

Soli Deo Gloria!

both His life and His death, accomplished our salvation. Lusk’s arguments against it hinge on the assumption that the creature can never merit anything from the Creator, but Lusk fails to carry through a distinction that he acknowledges early in his chapter between strict justice, on the one hand, and covenantal justice, on the other—a distinction that implies a coordinate distinction between strict and covenantal merit. Reformed systematicians who have defended the covenant of works (or of nature, as Turretin named it) have consistently affirmed the impossibility of a creature’s having strict merit in relation to the Creator, but they have argued that creatures can have covenantal merit—that is, by fulfilling a condition the Creator condescends to establish (see, e.g., Francis Turretin, Institutes of Elenctic Theology, 3 vols., trans. George Musgrave Giger, ed. James T. Dennison, Jr. [Phillipsburg, NJ: Presbyterian & Reformed, 1992, 1994, 1997], Eighth Topic, Q. III, at 1:574-578). Unless opponents of the covenant of works demonstrate why the notions of covenantal justice and covenantal merit are unbiblical—which they have not done—their opposition to the covenant of works on that basis rests on mere assumption. Calvin certainly embraced the idea of covenantal merit and made it integral to his soteriology, writing that whoever is engrafted into Christ obtains “all the merits of Christ, for they are communicated to” him (Institutes, 3.15.6; cf. 3.15.3,5).
